Directions: Read the passage carefully and answer the questions that follow.

German Miners at the Prosper-Haniel mine presented a chunk of black coal to their country's President Frank-Walter Steinmeier at a ceremony to announce the closure of the country's last black coal mine. This, however, doesn't mean that Germany will be completely off coal: the country will continue to import cheaper, foreign coal, which means mining operations such as drilling, blasting, hauling, collection, and transportation will pollute the countries that export coal to the economic powerhouse, but the pollution burden on the European nation will be much lower. Moreover, while Germany has closed down deep-shaft mining, it is yet to close down lignite, or brown coal, mines. Lignite is considered even dirtier than black coal but remains cheap to extract. Germany's decision to close down the last coal mine is to meet its decarbonisation goals. While these developments are positive news ---- phasing out coal is considered crucial to limiting global warming to within 1.5 degree C. The world's coal addiction is not going to go away soon because many parts of the world such as India and China still need the cheap fuel to power their economic growth.
