Comprehension:

Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

In 2014, the Copenhagen Zoo grabbed the world's attention by killing and publicly dissecting Marius, a healthy 24-month-old giraffe. Marius was put down, dissected and fed to lions.

We have much to learn about the physiology of animals such as giraffes. Overall, giraffes are like other browsing ruminants. They have a smaller omasum [third stomach] than grass-eating grazing ruminants. That correlates with feeding type since giraffes browse – eat foliage – in the wild. Cows, goats and sheep are well studied, but we don't know much about the digestive system of exotic ruminants. We need basic knowledge to better understand how to feed them. Because giraffes are the tallest living animal on earth, they have twice the blood pressure of other mammals. But they don't get the problems of humans with high blood pressure like heart enlargement, kidney failure or edema in the legs. Research has also found that giraffes have smaller salivary glands than predicted, compared to other browsing ruminants. What are the consequences of that? Maybe they don't tolerate the tannins in browse as well as other species?

There are a few fundamental difficulties in conducting basic research on exotic animals. Randomised trials with multiple control groups are impossible, so measurements have to be collected opportunistically, such as when wild or zoo giraffes became available – Marius was one such animal. As he matured, his father became increasingly aggressive toward him. Marius's genetic background was already represented in the European zoo giraffe population with close relatives at other zoos, so he was removed from the group and euthanised before a public necropsy. Today, scientists still invoke Marius when talking about public engagement in the social media age, the role of zoos in society and the complicated choices involved in animal management.

The Marius controversy has been a chance to raise people's consciousness about the complexity of managing zoos and conserving genetic diversity. The Marius affair also revealed a philosophical divide among zoos: some control breeding using contraception, while others allow natural breeding and cull animals later. The Copenhagen Zoo mainly lets animals mate and raise young, removing offspring when they would normally leave the group and euthanising them, if necessary, for space or genetic diversity reasons. In US zoos, however, the general approach is not to use euthanasia for management, stressing the safety of animal contraception.

Q.1 Which one of the following statements is FALSE?
Identify the correct option.

Question ID : 3675234755

- Ans
1. The Marius controversy was created by the media which telecast its necropsy.
 2. Culling or contraception are choices made by zoos, not by the public or governments.
 3. Research on giraffes is inconclusive as it can be neither random nor controlled.
 4. There is a divide among zoos due to their stances about animal conservation.

Comprehension:

Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

A short audio clip of a computer-generated voice has become the most divisive subject on the internet since the gold/blue dress controversy of 2015. The audio “illusion”, which first appeared on Reddit, seems to be saying one word – but whether that word is “Yanny” or “Laurel” is the source of furious disagreement.

Professor David Alais from the University of Sydney’s school of psychology says the Yanny/Laurel sound is an example of a “perceptually ambiguous stimulus” such as The Necker Cube, Ambiguous Figure or The Rubin’s Vase Ambiguous Figure which can be seen in two ways, and often the mind flips back and forth between the two interpretations. This happens because the brain can’t decide on a definitive interpretation.

If there is little ambiguity, the brain locks on to a single perceptual interpretation. The Yanny/Laurel sound is meant to be ambiguous because each sound has a similar timing and energy content – so in principle it’s confusable. All of this goes to highlight just how much the brain is an active interpreter of sensory input, and thus that the external world is less objective than we like to believe.

Alais says that for him, and presumably many others, it’s “100% Yanny” without any ambiguity. That lack of ambiguity he says is probably down to two reasons: firstly his age. At 52 his ears lack high frequency sensitivity, a natural result of ageing; and secondly, a difference in pronunciation between the North American accented computer-generated “Yanny” and “Laurel” and how the words would naturally be spoken in Australian or British English.

This argument is further supported by the cognitive neuroscientist Lars Riecke, who suggests the secret is frequency but some of it is also the mechanics of your ears, and what you’re expecting to hear. Most sounds – including L and Y, which are among the ones at issue here – are made up of several frequencies at once. Frequencies of the Y might have been made artificially higher, and the frequencies that make the L sound might have been dropped. While the frequency of the device you are listening on does have an impact, there are a lot of different factors playing into it.

When the brain is uncertain of something, it uses surrounding cues to help you make the right decision.

Comprehension:

Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

A short audio clip of a computer-generated voice has become the most divisive subject on the internet since the gold/blue dress controversy of 2015. The audio “illusion”, which first appeared on Reddit, seems to be saying one word – but whether that word is “Yanny” or “Laurel” is the source of furious disagreement.

Professor David Alais from the University of Sydney’s school of psychology says the Yanny/Laurel sound is an example of a “perceptually ambiguous stimulus” such as The Necker Cube, Ambiguous Figure or The Rubin’s Vase. Ambiguous Figure which can be seen in two ways, and often the mind flips back and forth between the two interpretations. This happens because the brain can’t decide on a definitive interpretation.

If there is little ambiguity, the brain locks on to a single perceptual interpretation. The Yanny/Laurel sound is meant to be ambiguous because each sound has a similar timing and energy content – so in principle it’s confusable. All of this goes to highlight just how much the brain is an active interpreter of sensory input, and thus that the external world is less objective than we like to believe.

Alais says that for him, and presumably many others, it’s “100% Yanny” without any ambiguity. That lack of ambiguity he says is probably down to two reasons: firstly his age. At 52 his ears lack high frequency sensitivity, a natural result of ageing; and secondly, a difference in pronunciation between the North American accented computer-generated “Yanny” and “Laurel” and how the words would naturally be spoken in Australian or British English.

This argument is further supported by the cognitive neuroscientist Lars Riecke, who suggests the secret is frequency but some of it is also the mechanics of your ears, and what you’re expecting to hear. Most sounds – including L and Y, which are among the ones at issue here – are made up of several frequencies at once. Frequencies of the Y might have been made artificially higher, and the frequencies that make the L sound might have been dropped. While the frequency of the device you are listening on does have an impact, there are a lot of different factors playing into it.

When the brain is uncertain of something, it uses surrounding cues to help you make the right decision.

Assuming you're reading this on a smartphone, you also owe a debt to Steve Jobs, who in 2006 asked Corning to make a very thin, strong screen for his new product, the iPhone. The result, Gorilla Glass, now dominates the market for mobile devices: Phones made with the fifth generation of this product can be dropped onto a rough surface from a height of five feet (selfie height) and survive 80 percent of the time.

That's just the start. Without glass, the world would be unrecognizable. It's in the eyeglasses on your face, the lightbulbs in your room, and the windows that let you see outside. But despite its ubiquity, there's still some debate within the research community about how to define "glass." Some tend to emphasize its solid qualities, others its liquidity.

Hi Mr. Kalia:

The letter you sent on 21 May, and the material about the sheets and rolls you make. Sounds nice, hmmm. But I want to check some things before we throw in money. You said the material is contemporary, but what happens when you update? Do we get money off the new one? You said it takes 2 weeks to confirm an order – that's too long! Any chance of faster delivery? Hope you can reply soon, we're in a bit of a hurry.

Thanks,
Jolly
