Directions: Read the short passage below and answer the questions that follow.

The etymological origin of nihilism is the Latin root word nihil, meaning 'nothing', which is similarly found in the related terms annihilate, meaning 'to bring to nothing', and nihilty, meaning nothingness. The term nihilism emerged in several places in Europe during the 18th century, notably in the German form nihilismus, though was also in use during the Middle Ages to denote certain forms of heresy. The concept itself first took shape within Russian and German philosophy, which respectively represented the two major currents of discourse on nihilism prior to the 20th century, leave alone the term heresy was coined to mean opposing religious beliefs. Early examples of the term's (nihilism) use are found in German publications. In 1733, German writer Friedrich used it as a literary term in combination with noism. In the period surrounding the French Revolution, the term was also a pejorative for certain value-destructive trends of modernity, namely the negation of Christianity and European tradition in general.

Nihilism first entered philosophical study within a discourse surrounding Kantian and post-Kantian philosophies. As early as 1824, the term began to take on a social connotation with German journalist Joesph von Gorres von attributing it to a negation of existing social and political institutions. The Russian form of the word, nigilizm, entered publication in 1829 when Nikolai Nadezhdin used it synonymously with scepticism. From the time of Jacobi, the term almost fell completely out of use throughout Europe until it was revived by Russian author Ivan Turgenev, who brought the word into popular use with his 1862 novel Fathers and the sons, where the nihilist characters negate every religious belief. Returning to German philosophy, nihilism was further discussed by German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, who used the term to describe the western world's disintegration of traditional morality. Religious scholars such as Altizer have stated that nihilism must necessarily be understood in relation to religion, and that the study of core elements of its character requires fundamentally theological consideration.
